My goal in painting icebergs is to portray their beauty and majesty within the context and magnitude of the problem of climate change. These sleeping giants seem on the one hand accessible and the other they mirror the most fascinating and unknown scientific wonders of the universe like the milky way, the northern lights, and the leviathan deep.

With the polar bears wandering south there also comes the problems of polar bears entering populated areas and polar/grizzly bear hybrids. There are only about 20,000 to 25,000 polar bears left in the whole arctic. Experts predict that by 2050, only one third of that number will still be alive. That's less than 7,500!

Polar bears depend on a cold Arctic for their survival. Sea ice, frozen tundra, and deep snow are instrumental to their existence. Polar bears need sea ice to eat—hunting ringed seals as they come up for air or rest on ice across the Arctic—and to travel, find mates, and teach their cubs how to live.
